ENGLISH HOMES.

Glance at the Interior of the Englishman's Castle.

DECORATIONS.

Where the Englishman Builds his Castle - Furniture and Arrange-ment of the Booms Generally.

In the midst of this landscape world the Englishman builds his house. And his house is his castle. It is the centre of his life and of his interests. His house is usually of red brick and of two stories, with a high wall all around it. An Englishman likes to be shut in. The sea shuts him in, and he is thereore born to it. The best part of his house is at the back. His drawing-room and dining-room front back. In all the houses where I have been, except, perhaps, two very modern ones the front of the house is taken up with the kitchen or offices of the house, such as buther's pantry and layatory. Most suburban and country houses are square, with a central hall and rooms arranged around it. The doors are small, and indeed, the windows and all openings are small. The rooms are larger—larger than in this country or in France or Germany. In the middle-class house there would be drawing-room, dming-room, sitting-room, and perhaps billiard-room on the first foor, besides a large space given to kitchen and pantries. The outside of the house is almost uniformly without architectural decorations. The duliness of the climate is seen in the somberness of the furniture and the decorations of the house. haps, two very modern ones- the front

Showing new residence of the 55th brown were defenced for the content of the conten comfort, having generally the most pleasant exposure to garden, sun and air. The kitchen is seldom near the dining-room, and the pantries are connected with the kitchen; so that the dining-room is free from all the odor of cooking and from all the necessary noise of the kitchen and pantries. As all meats and hot dishes are brought to the dining-room closely covered, there is seldom any smell from the kitchen floating about or lurking around the house.

Were the colors of the house less sobmer and the furniture less cumbrous; were the rooms more open and less separated each from the other, the English house would be the centre of the most perfect external comfort known to the domestic life of this world. As it is the English house is the home of sweet love, of thoughtful civility, and of unforgetting and undying loyalty.—Robert Laird Collier in Chicago News.
